Latin American and Caribbean theorists of the 20th century have characterized the ongoing systems of social order and knowledge production engendered by European colonialism across the American hemisphere as coloniality. In this talk, Tiffany C. Fryer brings this scholarship on coloniality into conversation with the analytic of settler colonialism which has more readily been applied to the colonial afterlives of Anglophone contexts. By presenting the findings of a community-centered archaeological research initiative from the Yucatan Peninsula, Fryer shows how we might also productively characterize the region as settler colonial.
