Authoritarianism is a reoccurring trend in Latin American history. As long as institutions cannot be established on a permanent basis, dictators keep surging, presently not through coup d'états, but through elections. Are we condemned to repetition? Has populism come to stay? Can we hope for democracy in the future?

Sergio Ramírez is a Nicaraguan writer who participated in the revolution that overthrew the Somoza family dictatorship in 1979. He later served as vice president of Nicaragua from 1985-1990.
